

preciation of contemporary management issues and the like.

• Senior Executives' Program

The concept of this two-week program is a new initiative. The program provides an opportunity for senior police executives to update their approach to management. Policing issues are identified and analysed within the context of a changing and more accountable political, social and economic environment and the contemporary challenges facing public sector managers are examined.

Each year the college offers one or two critical issues week-long seminars which generally produce a set of recommendations for consideration by the Australian police commissioners.

The critical issues seminars held in 1992 were Understanding Police Accountability and Performance Measures in Law Enforcement. There are no prescribed rank requirements for attendance at these seminars.

Regardless of the course attended at the APSC, the benefits are not only from the educational aspect but from those formed with colleagues from other services and the invaluable networking which results from this.

I was fortunate to attend the 43rd Senior Officers' Course in 1991 and question my reasons for not having taken the opportunity of attending earlier.

While the AFP has undergone considerable change in recent years, some of which we all find hard to accept, one only has to sit in a classroom at the college to comprehend fully the reasons for this change.

If you have not had the opportunity to attend a course at the college, I recommend you do so.

There is a limit to the numbers for each course. The following courses are scheduled for the first half of 1993:

17th Senior Police Executive Officers' Course. February 22 - April 2

Critical Issues Seminar Public Order in Australia — A Police Perspective April 26-30.

47th Police Management Development Program. May 10 - July 2.

Undergraduates and officers share a learning experience

By Keith Livingston

EARLIER this year, twenty-one undergraduates studying the degree course in Police Studies at the Philip Institute in Melbourne were permitted to work alongside operational police to 'get a feel' for the job.

The proposal to bring the undergraduates into the workplace for a period of 14 weeks generated a fair amount of scepticism amid suggestions it could be detrimental to operations.

There was, however, a degree of support also, as the arrangement had advantages for the AFP as well as undergraduates for a number of reasons.

The exercise proved to be truly beneficial from the AFP standpoint because it dispelled apprehensions held by a number of members that the undergraduates simply could not be 'accommodated' beside the working members.

Supervisors noted that as the 14 week period entered into the final few weeks the undergraduates were being regarded by many police as part of the team.

Many of the concerns expressed about the exercise had dissipated quite rapidly and the acceptance of the undergraduates was not only interesting but gratifying. One supervisor commented that the undergraduates' contribution was of great value to the organisation and their enthusiasm was also notable.

He cited one enthusiastic group whose members became so engrossed in their task that they insisted on working beyond the hours set for daily attendance so they could complete their assignment.

Where possible, the undergraduates did work which was necessary to the flow of operational activity, rather than being used to do the photocopying and filing. There was, of course, an element of the latter duties involved over the introductory period. Those undergraduates who expressed concerns about performing these seemingly 'menial' tasks were advised that they are very much a part and parcel of the police officer's lot.

The long-held belief by many within the AFP that an academic, fresh from university can not be successfully placed into a policing role, if not dispelled, was certainly put on a very shaky foundation. Members could see at first hand that these young people wanted to be in the AFP.

As a result of the experiment, gone for the undergraduates was the expectation that the job is full of glitz, glamour and chasing crooks, day in day out. The truth of the matter soon came home to them that there is a great deal of mundane and fairly monotonous and routine duties to perform.

From the undergraduates' comments in their debriefing, they saw the experience as being of genuine benefit. They thought it was useful to not only feel they were part of the organisation, but were also seen to be part of the AFP too.

It was obvious that it was most important to them that they had developed a feeling of 'belonging'.

The program planners also believe these young people will return to the community with a far better understanding of police work and will become ambassadors for the organisation spreading the word about the AFP and its professionalism.
