

Member Services Column

Application forms have arrived from BP Oil for the BP Plus Fuelcard. Practitioners who have already requested one will automatically have the form sent to them. If you have yet to express your interest in the card, The Law Society will accept requests while stocks last.

Card holders will automatically be charged the cheapest price for fuel at the time of purchase.

When you head to your nearest BP as a Law Society member, if you find that site is charging more than the BP Card price, you will only pay the Card price.

On the other hand, if a member refuels at a site where fuel is being heavily discounted — reducing the pump price to below your BP Card price — you will only pay the pump price ... at absolutely no extra cost.

Your BP Card works on a user pays system. There is a small transaction fee each time the Card is used — that's it! There are no surcharges or account fees on your Card.

A monthly statement will be sent to all participating members, with payments conveniently arranged through direct debit.

BP has the largest fuel network in Australia with more than 1800 sites. The Northern Territory now joins Western Australia, South Australia, New South Wales and Victoria in providing this service to Law Society members.

In other Member Services news, firms are still being encouraged to join the Qantas Australian Airlines arrangement, which is offering substantial savings on both domestic and international travel for all Law Society members.

Help The Law Society team to make your Law Society more appealing to its members by supporting our special services.

In addition almost 50 practitioners attended the Law Week Luncheon to hear guest speaker Rod Burr wax lyrical about modern family life. Balance will feature a full report on Law Week next month.
