HUMAN RIGHTS LEGISLATION AMENDMENT ACT (NO.1)

Representatives from the Federal Court visited Darwin in June to explain to the Territory profession the changes in the way the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission deals with complaints following the introduction of the Human Rights Legislation Amendment Act (No.1) 1999.

Prior to 13 April 2000 if a Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commissioner conducted an investigation and decided to cease the inquiry the person who made the complaint could request that the President review the decision.

Under the new Act, the President investigates and attempts to settle complaints by conciliation. At the end of the process, if the President decides the complaint cannot be conciliated, or should not proceed on one of a number of grounds set out in the new Act, then the President will terminate the complaint.

If this occurs, the parties will be issued with a Termination Notice. The President can no longer deal with a complaint once it has been terminated and therefore the Commission's file on the matter will be closed.

On receiving a Termination Notice the person who made the complaint will be able to apply to the Federal Court for a hearing. It is for that person to decide whether they wish to pursue the matter in the Federal Court. The Commission itself cannot refer matters to the Federal Court.

The reason given for the changes to the presidential review process are that decisions made by the Federal Court are enforceable but decisions made by the Commission are not.

Under the new Act the Commission will not commence any public hearings after 13 April 2000. This will be done by the Federal Court.

More information on these changes can be obtained from one of the Presidential Review Officers on: 1300 369 711 (for the price of a local call).
